HIST 373b: Reflection (Spring 2024)

Your reflection on your own learning this term is a vital part of the process that will determine your final grade for this course.

Please read through all the questions below before you begin to thoughtfully write your answers, and make sure your answers are in full paragraphs, not single sentences. Take as much space as you need and be as specific in your answers as possible. And if you haven't already signed up for a one-on-one conversation with me this week, you can do so by clicking on this link to the [sign-up sheet].

Name
1:	What is the most important historical skill you learned or refined this term, and why?
2:	What is the most important piece of historical information you learned or added to your understanding of this period, and why?
3:	How did you grow as a reader this term? And how thoroughly did you respond to the reading reflection prompts in the first five weeks of class?
4:	How did you grow as a researcher this term? And how thoroughly did you respond to the library exercises you completed in class?
5:	How did you grow as a writer this term? And how did you engage in the drafting process?

6:	In what way was your final paper an act of exploring new intellectual territory for you?
7:	What discoveries did you make about yourself in writing your paper?
8:	If you had one more 300-level class ahead of you, what would you do to grow further from where you're ending this term?
9:	What advice would you give someone taking this class in the future?
10:	If there is anything else we should discuss about you, your paper, or your term, or you have thoughts that are not captured by the questions here, please feel write about that in the space below.

11. What grade do you think you have earned in this course and why?
Turn in this reflection by midnight on Tuesday, May 28, on Classroom.
rannin and renection by manight on raceady, may 20, on elassionin